Commentary

Global equity markets saw positive momentum slow in Q4 2009, after a very strong year, on concerns about the risks of a jobless economic recovery, uncertainty around health care legislation, increased financial regulation in the US and signs that central banks around the world were preparing to unwind emergency liquidity measures. Weak macro-economic data contributed to market underperformance in October. However, increased M&A activity and better than expected earnings reports from several major companies helped the markets rally in November. December continued the rally on better than expected macro-economic data.
